Curriculum Review Report

November 2016

Context

Sociology combines the rigour of a scientific discipline with a concern for social relevance. It emerged in the nineteenth century as an attempt to understand the transition from traditional to modern society. Contemporary sociologists study the ways in which social structures, social processes and cultural products constrain and enable human activity, using a range of empirical methods (including ethnographic observation, in-depth interviews, surveys, statistical analysis, and analysis of cultural products). Sociologists ask how class, gender, race, ethnicity, age and geographic region shape people's lives and affect access to scarce resources like wealth, power and prestige as they explore the nature and operation of the social institutions that constitute Canadian and other societies. Sociologists study international processes, like migration and international development, and examine the linkages between global and local levels.

The undergraduate Sociology program at the University of Calgary strives to cultivate students' sociological imaginations by offering a range of opportunities to think sociologically and to use different theoretical approaches, research methods and data-analysis techniques. Our program provides a strong foundation in sociological theory and research methods and invites students to explore diverse approaches and topic areas within the field of sociology. Our courses promote co-learning, critical thinking, effective communication, team skills and adaptability, assets that many potential employers look for in graduates. We emphasize community engagement and global citizenship.

There has been a significant growth in student participation in the Sociology program in recent years, which went from 401 majors in 2011 to 606 majors in 2015; as well, sociology courses are popular elective courses and our lower level courses attract large numbers of students majoring in other fields. This growth has put pressure on the program to ensure enough sections of core courses to accommodate the increased number of majors and has necessitated some redeployment of resources in order to meet learning objectives across the program.

The Sociology Department curriculum review took place in 2015/2016.

Guiding Questions

1. In what ways do our courses contribute to our program objectives?

What are our strengths? Gaps? Highlights and problem areas for students?

2. How well does the present structure of prerequisites function to meet student needs?

Do prerequisite courses provide students with the information and skills needed for success in higher-level courses?

Are there any prerequisites that are not needed and may unnecessarily restrict the ways students can move through the program?

Are there prerequisites that should be added?

Could an alternative set of prerequisites be established for Law & Society majors wishing to register in 400-level Sociology courses associated with the Criminology concentration?

3. Is there a central core of common content and/or learning activities that should be offered in all required core courses that are taught in multiple sections, by different instructors (SOC 201, SOC 313, SOC 311, SOC 315, SOC 331, SOC 333)?

What currently is the overlap in content and/or learning activities among different sections of the same course?

What are the significant points of difference?
